COLOUR

your emotions

British people sometimes say they 'feel blue' when they're sad, and they 'see red' when they're angry. Can colours really change our emotions?

① When we look at different colours, our feelings change because the colours change chemicals in our bodies. These chemicals control our feelings.

② Some colours, for example blue and green, are relaxing. Green is the most relaxing colour. It's the best colour for your bedroom. It can also help you feel calm when you're nervous. That's why doctors and nurses sometimes wear green uniforms in hospitals.

③ Red, orange and yellow are positive colours. We feel happy and excited when we see them. They're the best colours to wear when you're sad. Yellow is also good when you've got an exam at school because it helps you feel confident. But these colours can also be negative. People can sometimes get angry when they see them.

④ People in different countries think about colours in different ways. In China, for example, people wear white to funerals. But in Europe, black is the colour of death, and white is for peace and purity. In Europe, brides often wear white, but Chinese brides wear red. In China, red is for happiness and money.
